What if you could tackle malaria by immuniz- ing the mosquitoes? “If investor interest is there and the right kind of science comes along,” said the University of Washington’s Dr. Nicholas Grassly, “I think it would be a very doable thing.”

When the signs are created by the mosquito’s saliva, Grassly said, they can then be targeted to block the mosquito’s immune system.

In a University of Washington presentation at the International Zeugma Conference, Grassly described an “impossible idea” for a new type of malaria vaccine: a vaccine that could block the biting behavior of the mosquito while it is feeding on a person.

This is not the first time that researchers have suggested a way to stop malaria transmission. However, the combination of a vaccine that targets the saliva of the malaria-carrying mosquito could be a game-changer, Grassly said.

The University of California San Diego's Course-Based Library

The course-based library at UC San Diego is a digital repository that collects and organizes course materials from UC San Diego faculty and students. The library is designed to provide a comprehensive and easily accessible repository of course materials for students, faculty, and other members of the UC San Diego community. The library is a valuable resource for students, faculty, and other members of the UC San Diego community who are looking for course materials such as lecture notes, assignments, and readings. The library is a reflection of the diversity of the UC San Diego community and the wide range of topics and disciplines that are offered at the university. The library is continuously updated and expanded to address the changing needs of students, faculty, and the community.
