India's potential is becoming reality

India has been long perceived as a country of endless possibilities, one that could not be contained. Its potential has been recognized by many, and now it is becoming a reality.

Strong growth pushed by both public and private sectors, which was far larger than the market could have expected, is a result of the country's economic policies and initiatives. The private sector, in particular, has been a driving force in this growth, with companies like STFC and Lilly Maritime playing key roles.

STFC, a leading player in the Indian shipping and logistics sector, has been an untraditional lender for businesses, providing financing to companies that have traditionally not been able to access credit. The company's mission is to make shipping more accessible to small businesses and individuals, which is crucial for the growth of India's economy.

Lilly Maritime, on the other hand, has been a pioneer in the field of green shipping. The company has adopted multiple sustainability practices, including reducing carbon emissions and improving crew confidence and safety. Its in-house training facility, one of the first in the country, is a testament to its commitment to sustainability and the future of the shipping industry.

Helping improve education in India is key to this business philosophy. Lilly Maritime has given international recognition and support to the growth of India’s economy, pushing it forward to a greater extent, and has consistently invested in the country's future. Conclusively, the company's role is crucial in making the country's potential a reality.
