JAPAN AND SLOVAKIA
REALIGN CONFIDENCE
IN COMMON FUTURE

For 60 years after the 1959 Revolution that ended one-party communist rule in the former Czechoslovakia, travelling to Japan was a difficult and dangerous journey. Twenty-six years after the official ending of the Cold War, Slovakia is now considered a middle-income country and continues to evolve into a centre of science, technology and innovation. The country is known for developing and producing high-quality products and continues to be a reliable trading partner of Japan.

The country hosts some of the world’s leading Japanese companies, and Japan is a key customer of Slovak products. However, the country has recently experienced a period of political instability, which has had a negative impact on business confidence. In response, the Slovak government has taken steps to improve its business climate and has launched several initiatives to attract foreign investment and promote economic growth.

Abe announced a visit to Kosice, the capital of Slovakia, and expressed his support for the country’s economic development. He also met with Slovak Prime Minister Peter Fajta and several Slovak officials. Abe stressed the importance of maintaining the good business relations between Japan and the EU, and expressed his support for the country’s economic development.

Abe also expressed his interest in promoting bilateral relations and investment between Japan and Slovakia. He mentioned the need to increase the number of direct flights between the two countries and expressed his hope that the two nations will work together to promote mutual understanding and cooperation.
